

FIND THE JOB > THE RIGHT JOB

'If I knew then what I know now': Advice for college graduates

April 25th, 2012 By Debra Auerbach in Find the job, The right job

Leave a comment

f Recommend 10 t Tweet 36 in Share 7 g+1 2

If you had a time machine, would you travel into the future to see what's in store for you 10, 20 or 30 years from now? Or would you rather travel back in time, perhaps right after college graduation, to fix a mistake you made or take another path in life?

As college seniors get ready to graduate in the coming months, they will be faced with making big decisions on everything from their career to their finances to their personal and professional relationships. So we asked recent graduates, seasoned professionals and hiring managers to get in a virtual time machine and finish the following sentence: "If I knew then what I know now..." What would they have done differently post-graduation? How can their hindsight help the class of 2012 and beyond?

Here's what they had to say:

I would find the right job fit

"If I only knew how important job 'fit' was to one's strengths, weaknesses, values, likes, dislikes and work style, I might have gone down a different career path. I was misaligned for years in an industry that I had little interest in. It took a company layoff for me to take a step back and realize my true passion was in my current field of college career guidance. Today I tell students, 'Don't waste your talents or your precious life.' I strongly suggest to college graduates to complete an interests assessment and have a good understanding of themselves before they start their career paths." — *Elizabeth Venturini, college career strategist

I would seek out a mentor

"Seek out mentors throughout your career, because guess what? No one knows everything. If you don't have a mentor in your office, network in your industry until you find one. Building a strong career support system is key to career success — whether you are entry level or a seasoned VP." — Jennifer Maguire Coughlin, president, Jennifer Maguire Coughlin Public Relations

I would pursue my passions

"Do what you love and trust the rewards will follow. A young friend of mine dropped out of college and decided he'd try music — or as he put it — jump out of the airplane and hope he could stitch a parachute on the way down. He has, and five years later his music is selling and he has toured the world, getting an education he'd never have had in college. I know that a college education is important to lots of careers, but it should be a career you really want ... it is better to major in something you want to learn and will love, whether there is a job in it or not. But if you love it enough, chances are you'll find or create the job to fill your dreams." — *Walter Meyer, author of "Rounding Third"

STAY CONNECTED

f t g+ You Tube RSS

—All United States—

—All Job Categories—

- Search by Company

MOST COMMENTED MOST VIEWED ARCHIVES

I would think long term

“Plan your career with current and future flexibility preferences in mind. Think not only about what you’re doing right now or want to do in the short term, but about your longer-term career path and how your personal choices might affect your future family life. For example, if you want to pursue a career in law but are looking for some flexible options when it comes to work, there are specialties that lend themselves to that ... I can say with confidence that an initial focus on integrating the two will result in much smarter long-term choices and comfort.” – Allison O’Kelly, founder/CEO, national flexible staffing firm Mom Corps

I would start planning early and use my college career center

“I graduated from the University of Georgia in December 2005 and have been working and not working for the past seven years since graduation. If I only knew [then] what I know now, I would have used my college’s career center much more effectively and begun my job hunt in the spring rather than the fall. I also would have made the effort to have more internships in my desired field and created a stream of income for myself to offset the challenge of finding a job.” – Eboné Smiley, independent stylist, jewelry company Stella & Dot

I would be more cognizant of college expenses

“I would have been much more diligent in trying to reduce my college expenses. College wasn’t as expensive back then as it is now, but it was still a major financial burden. Rather than trying to minimize expenses before I graduated, I found myself on graduation day with more debt than I should have. I likely qualified for several scholarships and grants, but I never fully investigated the topic. I rarely worked a part-time job or paid internship during school, although I could have fit it into my schedule. I did work hard on my schoolwork, but I could have done more to ease the debt I graduated with.” – Andrew Schrage, co-owner, Money Crashers Personal Finance

I would make every room a classroom

“I would have better understood the value of strategic networking and making every room I enter a classroom. Earlier in our career, it is difficult to understand how every relationship we develop matters. So we may not stay in touch or communicate well with those in our circle of influence. But these relationships can prove quite valuable in our professions as our careers evolve. It’s important to cultivate our relationships — both personal and professional. It’s equally important to understand that every task is meaningful. If you’re an unpaid intern, a work-study student or an entry level seasonal employee at a retail store, you have ample room to learn and grow from every assignment.

“Filing documents offers the opportunity to learn to be organized and learn about a company or department. Delivering mail offers the opportunity to network. Answering phones offers the opportunity to sharpen your verbal communication skills and, sometimes, ability to troubleshoot customer issues. Every room, every space we enter is a classroom, and later we are often given ‘pop quizzes’ at unexpected times within our career.” – Uva Coles, dean of career management services, Peirce College in Philadelphia

RELATED ARTICLES

Some fatherly (career) advice

Graduating college this year? Start your job search off right

Job search advice from ‘Top Chef’

What happens after high school? A look at college enrollment and work activity

About Debra Auerbach

Debra Auerbach is a writer and blogger for CareerBuilder.com and its job blog, The Work Buzz. She researches and writes about job search strategy, career management, hiring trends and workplace issues. Born and raised in Minnesota (ya betcha!), she graduated from the University of Wisconsin-Madison (go Badgers!) with a journalism and mass communication degree and currently resides in Chicago. She despises cold weather, which is obvious given the places she's chosen to live. When not working, Debra enjoys (reading Us Weekly and watching "The Real Housewives of [Insert City]") spending quality time with her husband.

0 comments 0 people listening

Sign in

+ Follow conversation Post to Post comment as

FIND the job

Networking
The right job
How to search

GET the job

Interviews
Resume
Salary negotiation
Cover Letters
Following up

ON the job

Dress Code
Work/Life
Co-workers
Getting a raise
Work from home
Benefits
Bosses

News & Trends

Surveys
Video
Who's hiring
Social media
CareerBuilder updates

The WorkBuzz

Home
Categories
Archives
Contributors
Write for Us

Visit our site for hiring professionals

Privacy | About | Terms | Contact Us

© Copyright CareerBuilder.com. All rights reserved. Entries on TheWorkBuzz.com may not be reproduced without the permission of CareerBuilder.com.

Site by: The Ocean Agency - Chicago SEO Company